Vistas

Connie and I have friends who have been traveling in their RV through several states out West. We've enjoyed seeing pictures of blue skies in Colorado, Balanced Rock in Arches National Park, sunrises in southern Utah, sunsets at Lake Powell in Arizona, and Horseshoe Bend on the Colorado River, to name a few.

Looking at these postcard-perfect pictures, all I could think to say was, "Wow!" If you have never had an opportunity to travel the roads of our western states by car or RV, this should be on your bucket list. Once you cross the Mississippi River the geography becomes larger and more dramatic with each passing mile. Wow!

I love the fall foliage, rolling hillsides, rugged mountains, and beautiful horse farms in our Bluegrass State. However, our sight line here in the eastern half of the U.S. is limited by density of people, buildings, and thick forests. You have to climb something to see above the structures and nature out here.

Sometimes, when I'm alone, I like to imagine what God's view of His brilliant and colorful creation must be like. God is so amazing that He made our eyes capable of seeing the world in all of its technicolor beauty. Functionally, seeing everything in black and white would have been adequate. My friends with color blindness tell me how their vision works perfectly except they are only seeing a limited spectrum of color.

During these times of COVID-19 restrictions, many of us have returned to simple practices. Some have enjoyed walks again or watching nature come alive in the morning. I have enjoyed viewing heavy fog rising from the farm pond beyond our back fence. Ground level has its charms but the higher and farther we might see, sometimes the greater the beauty.

Long ago when I was still in the military, I was flying home from South Korea in the middle of the night. Our plane passed by Mt. Fuji. I can still remember looking out my window at snow peaks sparkling in the moonlight. All I could say was, "Wow!"

When our world gets dusty, dirty, and cloudy down here, flying above the clouds brings a clearer picture of Earth as a whole. For months conversations on social media seem like a dusty, dirty, storm blowing in unfriendly weather. People are a lot like the weather; we can be unpredictable and turn on you in a hurry. We lose sight of the beauty God created.

Maybe these are the sort of times it would be helpful to take that road trip. Maybe get outdoors, check out some vistas God has given us for our pleasure. Take a rest from social media and breathe some fresh air again.

Climb higher, imagine the view from God's seat. Wow!
 Moving Forward. God is Good.
