SMALL THINGS ARE BIG THINGS

Molly McLeod

Small Things Matter

I just bought a latte at a local coffee shop. The girl behind the counter who fixed my drink is a friend. She is a twenty-something year-old I met at a different coffee shop about three years ago. It was during a bad time in her life; a boyfriend had beaten her up pretty badly. She came to work with a black eye. I gave her a Journey Church card and told her to let us know if there was anything we could do.

Not long after this exchange, she quit that job. Over the next couple of years, she worked part-time at different coffee shops in the area. It took her a while but she did get her feet back under her and broke it off with the abusive guy. I saw her again last year and she told me she had enrolled in college classes. She seems to be on a path of recovery.

Today we exchanged a pleasant, "Hello, good to see you again." As I began to walk away she smiled and said, "You know that business card you gave me a while ago? I still have it in my purse." It felt good to hear that my small, friendly gesture had mattered that much to her. As I walked away I said, "Let us know if we can ever do anything to help."

You never know how a small thing like a business card might be used to provide support and friendship for someone having a really bad day. Next time you are at a coffee shop or anywhere else full of people you don't know, look around the room before you sit down. Maybe find a person who looks like they just need a little friendly nudge; introduce yourself and have a seat. It might be the beginning of a valuable friendship.

If you are looking for a story that is worth sharing with others, risk it; be nice to strangers.

Moving forward
God is Good
